Activity Based Working – A Solution for Workstyle Change in Japan?

Activity Based Working (ABW) was born in the Netherlands 26 years ago to disrupt the traditional work practices, drive productivity and provide employees with the freedom to work anywhere, anyhow and anytime. The physical workplace has typically been managed by real estate, many times in isolation from the business leaders and from HR. However, what if the workplace could bring about a new way of working and bring out the best in an organization's people? This session explores how the physical workplace can be one of the most powerful leadership levers to drive workstyle change. More importantly, this session explores some of the personal, professional, and societal implications to challenge deeply ingrained workplace practices that simply are not serving us anymore.

Iolanda Meehan is the Managing Partner for Veldhoen+Company in Asia. Iolanda has more than 20 years of experience in previous roles as HR management consultant and as business leader in PwC, Philips and Haworth. Iolanda will hold an interactive session, sharing a lot of examples, best practices and lessons learnt from ABW projects in Australia, Asia and Europe. After the workshop, you are invited to participate in a networking session over some drinks and small bites.
